Languauge Inequality and Conflict :
A Research Bibliography, 1970-

Introduction

This is an initial attempt at the compilation of a bibliography of research literature on language inequality and conflict. It contains research publications which deal with inequality and/or conflict concerning (aspects of) a language or languages between social groups.

Since language inequality and conflict is not a well defined or established research area, some explanation seems in order here. As is well known, social groups are often demarcated by language difference in the broadest sense of the word, that is, difference in (aspects of) languages or language varieties such as dialects, style and the like. In other words, language difference serves as a boundary marker between social groups. In this sense, social groups in question can be regarded as language groups. More important, relationship between such social groups bounded by language differences are in many cases unequal politically, economically, socially or otherwise. Since the groups in question are defined in terms of language difference, the inequality manifests often as that of languages or language varieties, for example, glorification or debasement, imposition or prohibition, of a language or language variety of either group. Moreover, it may lead to a conflict, violent or otherwise, between the groups in which language is an important substantial or symbolic issue.

The present bibliography contains research literature dealing with these topics. To use the celebrated terms of Roger Brown and Albert Gilman, the present bibliography is intended to be one dealing with language involved in "power and solidarity" relationships between social groups. The actual selection is, however, very difficult and often depends upon my personal judgement, because of the difficulty of the definition of the concept. Moreover, it is severely limited in several respects. First, as for social groups, the bibliography focused upon only two categories: ethnic or nationality groups and economic or social classes. Other important social groupings such as gender, generation and so on are left completely out of consideration. Secondary, it contains only those literature published since 1970 and written in English. Thirdly, it contains only research literature and does not contain any primary documents.

The bibliography is also available on request in the MS-DOS text file format and WordPerfect (version 5.2) format.

This research was assisted in part by the grant-in-aid from the Japanese Ministry of Education, Science and Culture (No 06620054).
